John Horgan and Andrew Weaver
The leading NDP candidate in the recent by-election... (text continues)

2 Geoff Meggs
CHIEF OF STAFF, NDP
Local Rep There was some high living around Vancouver City Hall when the news came that Geoff Meggs—city councillor for almost a decade, one-time communications guy for former premier Glen Clark—was going to be chief of staff for new premier John Horgan. Meggs knows intimately the city files that require co-operation from the province, transit, housing, Uber, Airbnb, Meggs, who was on the NDP's election platform committee with Carole James, helped draft a pro-union platform, so he'll know how to carry it out. He's also seen as a straight shooter—even by the Liberals.

3 Ian Gillispie
CIBC WESTERN PROJECTS
Skylines King Next year, one of the most remarkable additions to the Vancouver skyline since the Woodward's 19 restructured stop that summer development in 2011 will rise from the foot of Granville Street Bridge. It's an enterprise that the developer behind both in Westbank Group, Ian Gillispie, Gillispie has built a reputation as a singular builder and savvy political operator in a city full of fresh start-up developers—and the shimmering, multi-story tower is a testament to his skill. Gillispie, who has worked for the British Columbia government, is now in charge of the project, even leading his own team in favour of a before city council.

4 Gregor Robertson
BC'S ATTORNEY GENERAL
Civic Issue The election of NPA councillor Gregor Robertson in the recent by-election shows a city-wide slip in confidence for Robert's Vision Vancouver and a dip in his position on this list. But of all the current NDP candidates, he has the most going in the time he's been in the most-often-cited crisis in the city's history. Robertson, who has worked for the British Columbia government, is now in charge of the project, even leading his own team in favour of a before city council.

5 David Ely
B.C.'S ATTORNEY GENERAL
Letter of the Law As the NDP's leading critic, David Ely was a force to be reckoned with. Thanks to his handling, the Liberals implemented the foreign-investor tax, and they practically gutted the Parent Grey ruling by Ely during the May election. Now that he's NDP's attorney general, Ely's potential for power is tremendous, but we may have to wait to judge his effectiveness. He's also reinventing himself as a political figure, signing legislation to create a new political party, and he's also been instrumental in the NDP's success.

Aquilino Family
AGRIUM GROUP
The Dynasty If you're an attentive watcher of the Aquilino family's conglomerate, with assets in real estate development, hospitality and entertainment, then you've likely picked up on a trend in their investing in the past few years. Unlike among private-sector players, the Aquilinos have emerged as powerful backers of municipal business ventures. From the proposed Eagle Spirit pipeline in B.C.'s northeast to the mega redevelopment of the 38.8-acre Jericho Lands in Point Grey.

7 Dr. Mark Tyndal
EXECUTIVE MEDICAL DIRECTOR, BC CENTRE FOR DISEASE CONTROL
Health Crusader It is the greatest tragedy in B.C. in many—counting more than 1,000 lives in the first eight months of 2017—and for Mark Tyndal, executive director of the BC Centre for Disease Control (BCDC) and deputy provincial health officer, the need to take bold action on the epidemic crisis is now. In an August report, the BCDC made its recommendations for tackling the fungal epidemic, including providing free access to pharmaceutical-grade opioids for adults and, more controversially, decriminalizing illegal drug use and moving toward legalization and regulation.

8 Bob Rennie
PRESIDENT & CEO, CONCORD PACIFIC GROUP
The Collector Bob Rennie's departure from his role as chief fundraiser for the BC Liberals four months before the election marked an end of an era in the past four years, the party raised a $10-million campaign fund. One of his last acts was to pour his resources into low-controversial endeavours and philanthropy, donating $2 million dollars' worth of art to the National Gallery of Canada. Rennie, however, has' entirely stepped from the public eye. At the height of the debate of 105 Keefer Street, Rennie was a vocal supporter of the project, even leading his own team in favour of a before city council.

13 Terry Hui
PRESIDENT & CEO, CONCORD PACIFIC GROUP
City Shaper Having built much of Vancouver's skyline over the past three decades, Concord Pacific Group has turned some of its attention to projects in Calgary, Toronto and London, U.K. Yet as Hui's company branches out into new markets, it's also reinventing itself right here at home with an overhaul of its tower-and-podium model that's synonymous with Vancouver—at least at its upcoming redevelopment at Palse Creek North. That yet-to-be-named project will be built in a "completely new style of architecture for the area," according to Joe Hruza, an architect on the project, in comments to the Globe and Mail.

23 Thomas Fung
CHAIRMAN & FOUNDER, FAIRCHILD GROUP
Dollar Tycoon One of the hottest categories in retail right now is the "value-priced" model—the dollar store—with a flurry of competitors entering the Canadian market in recent years. Thomas Fung is one of them, Daiso, as his Aberdeen Centre mall and holds North American franchise rights for the Japanese chain. Daiso is just one piece in a diverse—and increasingly recession-proof—portfolio for Fung's Fairchild Group, which includes everything from Chinese-language TV and radio stations to real estate holdings to an import/distribution arm.
